"Among the problems are these: What kinds of cognitive structures are developed by humans on the basis of their experience, specifically, in the case of acquisition of language?"

1968 - "survivor syndrome" - defined as a set of clinical characteristics exhibited by someone subjected to terror during a military action.

1968 - "survivor" and "W.A.R." (World of Abnormal Rearing) are incorporated into family therapy terminology regarding domestic violence.

1971 - use of term "survivor" in literature to describe anyone who addresses adversity.

1992 - The Reader's Guide to Popular Literature lists 258 instances of "survivor" in article titles.

"survivors" - as formerly occupied territories

What, if anything, happens to the present tense when language acquisition and corporal punishment occur simultaneously?

The expression I associate with the dissolution of communal or alternative living experiences circa 1968 is "I'm a survivor". The problem at hand would be one of generic territoriality (regarding such things as toilet paper or milk), secondary to a general inequality based on earning capacity and worldly status. A slight of milk would evoke a "survivor" statement, a seemingly melodramatic response but one which indicated that all future negotiations already had been settled in favor of those who were actively experiencing pain - the uniform code of trauma. The difficult issues of the economic differences of those living there and their effect on slice-of-life inequalities couldn't be addressed. The living experiments failed. For lack of long-term financial backing, the political experiments were of such short duration that our arguments regarding why they failed are based more on conjecture than observation.

My sister Mimi works in an "employment program" for the "mentally ill".
One of the members often would pace, his hands up to his temples, opening and closing his fists, his fingers so many exclamation points in the air.
Mim would ask "What are the voices saying?" He'd reply: "It's the class struggle going on in here."
